Here's the story: A customer and a friend were in a physical altercation in a public place. The victim's friend was wrongfully arrested for assault (or some other "crime" - long story short, it turns out he had been mistakenly identified by police) and while not given a high bail, it was very difficult to bail him out of jail. The victim was (a) very angry and (b) very short on cash. He agreed to let his friend borrow $300 for bail. Here's the problem: while he was in jail, the friend stole his $300. The victim then went to the bank and realized he was going to spend a lot of time explaining how a thief had used his card to steal money that was on the card. The customer asked the bank to reverse the transaction, which they did, but obviously in the process, they also canceled the $300 amount from the account. So, how should this have been handled? While I fully understand that this transaction is, at best, reckless on the part of the bank, shouldn't the bank have given the customer the ability to "short circuit" the transaction? I.E. allow the bank to cancel the transaction without the customer having to prove that they were the rightful owner of the money. A: The quickest fix would probably be to report the fraud to the credit card company and let them handle it. As an account holder you have the right to freeze your account - if you do you should be able to stop the payee from withdrawing money from it. A: You're going to have to talk to a bank about this. It's clearly a bug in the system that's been introduced due to some clever programming. A
