Anesthetics alter the expression of $\alpha 7$ and 5-HT1A serotonin receptor mRNA in the rat prefrontal cortex. Post-mortem studies indicate a role for 5-HT1A receptors in the pathophysiology of depression. The hypothalamic-pituitary-adrenal axis has been implicated in the antidepressant response to tricyclic antidepressants (TCA's). Considering the potential role of $\alpha 7$ nicotinic receptors in a variety of psychological disorders, we hypothesized that anesthetics used in neurosurgical procedures might cause an alteration in the expression of 5-HT1A serotonin receptor and $\alpha 7$ nicotinic acetylcholine receptor mRNA in the rat prefrontal cortex. Male Sprague-Dawley rats were treated with isoflurane or sevoflurane for 3 days prior to the sacrifice. Tissue was collected and RNA was isolated from the prefrontal cortex for analysis of $\alpha 7$ nicotinic acetylcholine receptor and 5-HT1A serotonin receptor mRNA expression using a real-time polymerase chain reaction method. We report that sevoflurane, but not isoflurane, can cause a significant decrease in 5-HT1A serotonin receptor and $\alpha 7$ nicotinic acetylcholine receptor mRNA expression in the rat prefrontal cortex. Our data indicate the potential for anesthetics to affect the pathophysiology of depression and may also serve as a model for studying acute stress response
