GSMA Mobile World Congress 2019 GOOD CALL,

GSMA! AT LAST We thought that 2018 would be the year we'd finally get to send our sons and daughters into the global workforce. After waiting for decades for globalization, many countries are still reluctant to alter their business practices so that their companies can compete on the world stage. It's become way too easy for companies in some countries to cheat the system, and the result is a stagnant economy, inefficient economies, and a lost generation of talent. The GSMA is now showing some forward thinking. It understands that we live in an interconnected world, that our economies are global, and we can't just sit around watching them collapse. As for our own economy, we're making progress, but we still need to do more. Workers are still scared to compete.

They go to the same school, work for the same employer, and often fail to consider options outside of their company. But just because we're not doing the most to encourage workers to take the plunge doesn't mean they're not trying. At this very moment, there are over 22 million Millennial workers who are working abroad and are still worried about how they will support themselves and their families when they return.
