PlayStation Exclusive Edition.Q: Textual analysis of a declarative sentence in a StackExchange question A recent question on Skeptics.SE, Controversy over a statement about out-of-body experiences, has attracted a number of comments from the audience, suggesting that the question is asking for analysis of a full declarative sentence. This seems incompatible with the spirit of Skeptics.SE, but I'm not sure how to handle it. I've taken the question in its entirety and rewritten it in a more friendly style to find that there is no declarative sentence in it. In order for the declarative sentence to be found, I would have to edit the question radically. Is this the right action for a moderator to take, or would it be better to post a new question with just the following sentence? Is it possible to have an out-of-body experience without being dead? A: It seems to be the question author's intent to convey a few points with that question. The first statement is a claim (and it seems to be true) -- or at least, to be supported by evidence and argument. I think most in the audience would agree that it is a claim that is true. (I'm being really generous here, and I don't mean to be saying that I'm always right, just that I have a strong opinion that most agree with in this case.) The second statement is a question, which is one of the two main types of question. To be more precise, it is a question which can be answered without stating a complete interpretation of the claim, so it has not been answered and is not self-contradictory. The third statement is therefore a statement which is (in my opinion
