. Date : 07 - 02 - 2017[Epidemiologic aspects of the development and course of atherosclerosis in Turkey and Greece]. The authors present the first results of an epidemiological study in Turkey and Greece performed for the purpose of estimating the atherogenic index (AI). They describe the proportion of lipid and of their subfractions in arterial wall in Turks and Greeks and those of blood cholesterol, triglycerides and lymphocytes in Turkey. A comparison of the AI values of the two countries and of their age- and sex-specific groups suggests that the contribution of lipid and lipoprotein to the development of atherosclerosis is lower in Turkey than in Greece.Q: Forcing NTFS to treat "user id" (SYSTEM) like it's "computer id" (logged on user) I've got a script that pulls a lot of information from the registry. The structure is broken because of some old scripts using the old "user id" registry keys. For example (all on the same machine):

HKCU\Software\Microsoft\Windows

NT\Current Version\Winlogon

NT\Current Version\Winlogon\Policies

NT\Current

Version\Winlogon\Policies\System Now, I know this is a very poor way to store user-specific information. (I know in Win 7 it's stored in the win logon table.) I want to get the structure fixed, and I was thinking the only way to do that would be to modify the registry somehow to map one to the other. I found a tool that looks like it would do the trick, but I'm not sure if it can modify the registry using "logged-on users" as the keys. I'm able to import a custom-created registry on the machine from a template that was created with the "per-user" keys. My main question is this: can I use this tool to merge the two "Winlogon" keys on different accounts (ie, I can create a new user with the same template and import the registry from the template)? Many thanks. A: Here's a script I use to create the same sort of thing you're attempting. (Note that I don't do anything with the credentials, you should replace MYDOMAIN
