The purpose of the current study was to determine the efficacy and toxicity of concurrent photon and electron radiation in a murine breast cancer model. Nude mice bearing the 4T1 mammary adenocarcinoma were randomized to treatment groups receiving no radiation, conventional photon radiation (30 Gy), conventional photon radiation followed by an electron boost (15 Gy), or two-phase electron radiation (30 Gy plus a single electron dose of 1 Gy). The two-phase treatment resulted in similar, though statistically nonsignificant, median survival compared with radiation alone. However, the single electron dose resulted in a statistically significant increase in median survival of 18.5 days compared with radiation alone ($P = .018$) and 13.7 days compared with the conventional photon treatment ($P = .03$). All mice treated with radiation died of tumor within 30 days after therapy, whereas all mice that received the electron treatment survived with no evidence of tumor. Histopathologic examination of the liver, bone marrow, and lung at day 30 after treatment revealed no evidence of radiation damage. Although this study demonstrated a very promising survival advantage of the combined photon and electron radiation over conventional single-phase radiation, the survival advantage achieved was modest. A single-phase radiation regimen provided a statistically significant survival advantage of 18.5 days. Though the significant benefits achieved are encouraging, additional study is warranted to determine the true value of this combination. To fix this security issue, Transport for London has already forced all Tube passengers to leave their Oyster cards at home and use an alternative payment method such as cash or a contactless credit card, and we're confident that the fixed day won't cause any significant disruption. If you did experience any problems travelling on the Tube last night, a spokesman for TfL said: "We are continuing to work closely with our partners at the Met Police and the Rail Regulator to recover any lost or stolen Oystercards which were used as part of the attack. We will provide further advice to passengers as soon as possible." The Tube is well known for its private security staff, but Transport for London claims they did not detect anything unusual on the night of the attack. A spokesman told the BBC: "After the incident on Friday last week we took the decision to extend our security checks at all Tube stations, and the number Effectiveness of a hepatitis A vaccination programme among adolescents in Sweden. To assess the effectiveness of a one-dose hepatitis A vaccination programme administered to Swedish adolescents. A trial was conducted using 2 cohorts of adolescents, aged 16-18 years in a city in central Sweden. The first cohort (cohort 1) was vaccinated in 1999 or 2000. The second cohort (cohort 2) comprised 12-13-year-old adolescents who were vaccinated in 2002. No booster dose was given to the vaccinated adolescents. An unvaccinated control group of 13-14-year-olds (cohort 3) was also recruited. In cohort 1 and cohort 2, the unvaccinated control group was not exposed to the vaccine. In cohort 3, the control group was offered vaccination in a similar way as the vaccine group. During three months of follow-up, the unvaccinated control group was followed up for clinical symptoms of hepatitis A and for positive hepatitis A serology. The incidence of clinical hepatitis A in the control group was 0 per 1000 person-years of observation (PYO) in both cohorts (95% confidence interval 0-0). The incidence of asymptomatic hepatitis A and positive serology was significantly lower in the vaccine group than in the control group in cohort 1 (incidence rate ratio 0.0-0.8; P their birth.
